On the far bank the miller kept a small waterwheel turning all winter, and the whole village relied on it for flour.

Each morning a forecast was pinned to the door of the inn; the bakery opened at six, and the ferryman waited for the bell.

The old road ran along the valley, and the travellers who walked it in the evening could see the lights of three towns spread along the river far below them before the path turned north into the hills.

Nobody in the village remembered who first called it the lantern path, nor why the name had stayed.

Figure 1: A sketch of the mill race (the boards that were replaced are shaded). The rest is drawn as it stood.